

The Aussiedoodle

The Aussiedoodle is a cross between an Australian Shepherd and a Poodle. Both of these breeds are considered to be canine Einsteins, making this a super smart, easily trainable cross-breed. The Aussiedoodle has a moderate to high activity level. They need a walk or an active playtime each day and they are athletic enough to excel in dogs sports such as agility, flyball, obedience and rally. They can also be excellent therapy dogs.

Keeping him occupied will ensure that he doesn't go off and find his own (likely destructive) entertainment. If you begin socialization and training early and use positive reinforcement techniques such as praise, play and food rewards, you will be rewarded with a wonderful companion.

Aussiedoodles are companion dogs. They love being with people and need to live in the house, never outdoors. Aussiedoodles comes in many different colours and patterns. The possibilities are endless!

Poodles have a reputation for being hypoallergenic, meaning that they can be tolerated by people who have allergies to dogs. Because they have the poodle in their heritage, Aussiedoodles are also sometimes promoted as being hypoallergenic. But allergies are caused not by a particular dog coat type but by the dander. There is no scientific evidence that any breed or crossbreed is more or less allergenic than any other dog. Some people with mild allergies react less to particular dogs, but no breeder can guarantee that their dogs are hypoallergenic.

Temperament is effected partly by inheritance and partly by environment, so it can be variable. An Aussiedoodle's temperament depends on several things: the temperament of his parents, especially the mother, the amount of socialization he receives and the particular genes he inherits. In general though, the Aussiedoodles are friendly dogs who are devoted to their families.

An Aussiedoodle will undoubtedly be smart and highly trainable, thanks to the intelligence of both breeds and the Australian Shepherd's strong desire to do a job. If you train an Aussiedoodle with positive reinforcement techniques, showing him what you like, he is likely to learn quite quickly and happily.
